A LIST OF BOOKS QUOTED IN THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

NOTE

THIS List, which has been compiled by two members of the editorial staff of the Oxford English Dictionary, Mr. F. J. Sweatman and Mr. H. J. Bayliss, comprises the titles of such works as have been most commonly quoted in the Dictionary. While it has no claim to be regarded as a complete guide to English literature, it will be found to contain a large proportion of the more important works, together with many others less familiar; it includes a large number of titles of periodical publications.

The arrangement is according to the alphabetical order of authors' names or titles of works. Following each title is the date of the first edition, or of composition (ascertained or inferred), printed in thick type. Where it is possible or necessary to give only a limiting date, such as that of an author's death, or of a manuscript in which the work is extant, this is preceded by a (= ante), e. g. BACON Works a 1626, King Horn a 1300. As occasion requires, the dates of editions used other than the first, or the names of editors or of series of publications, are added in ordinary type within round brackets. Where a title (e. g. Arnolde's Chronicle) is followed by a second title in brackets, the first is that by which the work is generally known, the second is its proper title. Round brackets are also occasionally used to indicate that works are questionably assigned to the authors under whom they are entered.

It is to be observed that the dates assigned (in the early years of the history of the Dictionary) to some Middle English texts and to a few books of later date (e. g. the plays of Shakespeare), as also certain ascriptions of authorship, have been modified by subsequent research (the resulting discrepancies rarely affect in any serious degree the chronology of words and senses).

THE NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY

THE corrections and additions to the N.E.D. will consist for the most part of specific instances of earlier uses and other meanings of particular words. But occasionally it may be necessary to refer merely to general sources of fresh information or to point out general ways in which it may be supplemented. The N.E.D. is inevitably a dictionary not of spoken English, nor even of written English, but of printed English, and the print is not always a faithful reproduction of the written word. This is notoriously the case in editions of mediæval and sixteenth and seventeenth century texts in which the spelling of the MS. has been modernised. For instance, under 'misdemeanour' and the year 1487, the N.E.D. quotes from the printed Rolls of Parliament the title of 3 Hen. VII. c. 1, giving the spelling 'authority'; but this is the spelling of the eighteenth century editor of the Rolls. The MS. has 'aucthority' but even this MS. is a gloss of the late sixteenth century and is not the spelling of 1487. Caxton has 'auctorite'; and thus is obscured the gradual transition during the sixteenth century from the Latin 'auctoritas' to the English 'authority' by adding an 'h' and then dropping a 'c.' The Englishing of Latin words is an important element in the history of the language, and some help to the study of literature.

A general reference may also be made to 'Surnames and the Chronology of the English Vocabulary,' an article in Discovery for January, 1921, by Professor Ernest Weekley and Miss Dorothy D. Pilkington. It contains examples of a large number of compound nouns used as surnames (e.g., ale-brewer, cellarman, cowkeeper), obtained from an examination of cartularies, borough records, manor court rolls, etc., which are, in many cases, considerably earlier than the first record of the same word as a common noun given in the N.E.D. The article is based on Miss Pilkington's thesis (1920) for the M.A. degree of the University of London, entitled 'English compound Nouns of the type used in personal Descriptions: a supplement to the Chronology of the N.E.D.,' a copy of which is in the University Library, South Kensington.

The reference N.E.D. followed by a date indicates the earliest instance of the word given in the Dictionary. The numbers after the words refer to the relevant senses in the N.E.D.

Alchemy, 3. 1393. Cal. Close Rolls, 1392–6, p. 239. 'A false metal called alconamye.' This form not in N.E.D.: its earliest date for the metal is 1440.

Amotion. 1465. Priory of Coldingham (Surtees Soc.), ccxii. 203: 'the amocion of the said sir Patrik Home frome the forsaid celle of Coldyngham and intrusion of him selfe into the same.' N.E.D. 1641.

Lease. [sb.[3] = a grant of lands or tenements in fee simple.] 1310. Year Books 3 Edw. II (Selden Soc.), p. 18: 'Et dit qe W. n'out entre si noun pus le lees qe William et Luce sa femme . . . de ceo en firent a Walter Evesqe de Coventrie et Luchefelde en fee.'

This reading is supported by four MSS., and two others giving slightly variant reports of the same case also use the phrase 'lees . . . en fee' (ibid., 16, n. 6); the note from the record [see below] seems to indicate that the Latin enrolment has the equivalent dimisit in feodo (ibid., 19). This sense does not occur in the N.E.D., and is indeed remarkable, for the word usually excludes grants of all estates greater than for years or for life.

The French lais seems only to mean bail; and although there is a form lais meaning something left by will, and another form laisse meaning gift or present, these words do not seem to be used of gifts of land other than à bail. See Godefroy, Dictionnaire de l'ancienne langue français, s.vv.

lais, s., 4 and 5 and laisse, s., 1. It is rather strange that the editor of the Year Book (Maitland) has not commented on this anomalous use of a legal technical term.

Tarit. 1389. 'Tarit of Genoa' occurs frequently in fourteenth and fifteenth century documents, e.g. Cal. Close Rolls, 1389–92, pp. 1, 2, etc. (11 references in all). Apparently it was a ship of the same class as the dromond—p. 545 (February 8, 1392), great ship called a 'dromond' or tarit. Not in N.E.D.

Tarit. There have been two notes on this word in the BULLETIN; one (ante, i. 98) pointing out that the word was not in the New English Dictionary; the other (ante, iii. 69), contributed by Mr. R. C. Anderson, suggesting that the word was a mis-reading for 'caric.' This last note seemed to me so improbable in view of the many occurrences of the word both in the Close Rolls and in the Exchequer Foreign accounts, that I ventured to submit to Sir Denison Ross my own theory that it was an Arabic word meaning a ship. He now writes: 'There is no possible reason for doubting the correctness of the word "tarit" as representing a ship; allusions ought to be found in many places, but the word takes one of two forms, namely "terrada" or "tarida."' He also adds a reference to Texeira's Travels, 1604–5 (Hakluyt Soc.), 1902, pp. 22 and 23, and to other places there mentioned, where the word occurs. To these I might add that it occurs in Bahâ Ed-Dîn's life of Saladin, chapter xii. It will be noted that the 'tarit' mentioned in the Close Roll was laden with a Saracen cargo in part.

Mr. Waddell also writes:

In reading through the documents of The Priory of Coldingham (Surtees Society, 1841), besides noticing a number of words that antedate the earliest examples in the Oxford English Dictionary (see Bulletin, v. 188–9), I have detected some misprints, a list of which may be useful to others. The most interesting, I think, is that on p. 161, l. 2, hendez: on consulting the MS. in the Chapter Library at Durham (this is one of the few originals that are available), I found that an e stands between the n (or u) and the d, and hence I take the true reading to be heuedez, i.e. heads (=headings, N.E.D. s.v. Head. sb. 13, perhaps in the sense of 'totals'). The use of the form heued in 1447 is justified by the N.E.D. quotation dated 1450 from St. Cuthbert (Surtees Soc.) 924, 'his fete upwarde, his heued doune.' Other presumed corrections are: p. 113, cxxvii. l. 7, 3outhede (youthhead); p. 136, l. 15, suthefast (in the notable phrase 'veray suthefast in the self'); p. 140, clv. l. 15, thes lese (this lease, as suggested by Mr. C. T. Onions); p. 232, l. 11, disposicion; p. 258, l. 9, predecessoure (?); Appendix, p. xv. 2nd last l. cuvis (so also pp. xvii, xix, xx); p. cvii, note l. 2, cenevettorio or cenevectorio. A complete list of errata is not attempted here: sometimes the number of the Registrum is given incorrectly in the heading, e.g. Nos. cxvi, cxlvi, and cxlviii all belong to Reg. I. (not II.).

May I add references to certain usages that appear interesting, uncommon, and in part unique, in the hope that I may elicit explanations? On p. 133, l. 6, juste is the reading in the MS. (which I have inspected), but in l. 7 comen is a single word, so that the phrase runs—'itt has no3t been hard in your countree my lettre3 to juste or an to comen in the contrary of an other': what is the meaning of juste and of comen? P. 135, cli. l. 20, wygette (? waged, pledged). P. 140, clv. l. 4, chang; p. 141, 4th last l. 'baith the tak and chang of the said place'; p. 147, clx. l. 10, 'the change of Ald Cambos' (Mr. C. T. Onions interprets chang as 'change' in some technical sense). P. 141, l. 16, sklandyng (an expressive word: cf. sklander, slander). P. 215, ccxx. l. 11, sane gart (Mr. C. T. Onions suggests, rather doubtfully, save gart, savegarde, safeguard). Ibid. l. 20 sp'ull, l. 22 p'pule, are puzzling contractions: perhaps some adept in canon law may explain. Appendix, p. xxviii, No. xxiii, l. 22, 'in mundacione et riddigin ejusdem ecclesiae': is this for 'ridding' (cleaning)? It can hardly be for 'ridging' in 1354: N.E.D. quotes the form 'ryggyng' at the date 1458. P. lxxv, No. lxi. l. 10, turrsyng (trussing), describing a type of basin—'ij pelves parvae pro locione, j pelvis turrsyng cum lavacro': Professor W. L. Renwick suggests the explanation that the basin packs up with the bath. Ibid. l. 11, 'j quarron et dimidium croci': is this a new form of Quartern sb.[2]? N.E.D. gives several examples of the form 'quartron' in the fourteenth century. P. lxxvii, l. 3, 'ij claythis de plumbo continens xxiiij pedes': apparently for 'sheets' of lead, but not under Cloth sb. in N.E.D. P. lxxxiii, 4th last l., 'j dormande, j qhylte, j fedirbed' in the Inventory of 1446: Fowler (Glossary) does not define 'dormande'—'frequently mentioned among articles of bedding.' P. lxxxiv, l. 13, 'iiij colyngfattis' (? cooling vats).

I wish to acknowledge gratefully suggestions and help from Mr. C. T. Onions and Professor W. L. Renwick, and also to thank Mr. J. Meade Falkner for his kindness in allowing access to original documents in the Chapter Library, Durham.
